

Mastek to discuss 'The Future for Citizen Services' at the Central Government Strategy Forum

“The government needs to do more to listen to its citizens’ and become more of a servant of its people, delivering the services citizens need.”

The statement above has been made quite often by Cabinet Office minister, Ben Gummer. He acknowledged the contribution of the Government Digital Service (GDS) in digital transformation of services to date and confirmed his ongoing support. Gummer has also stated how the government wants suppliers, both current and potential, to place user needs first, seeing data as a public asset and building services based on open standards and reusable components.

An active player in digital transformation enablement, Mastek will host a session on, ‘The Future for Citizen Services’ at the Central Gov. Strategy Forum on the 6th of December in Berkshire. From discussing the current landscape of citizen services, we will address the challenges and opportunities, review some initiatives delivered to date and imagine ‘citizen first’ future outcomes. We trust the session will serve to guide our collective thought process in the right direction.
